GRAND HOTEL PATEROS. Athens, Aug. 11, 1901.

Dear Friends-We went out this morning to attend service in a Greek church, but were too late. The sextons in two churches were sweeping. A few stragglers came into the glittering interior, crossed themselves at various stations and kissed images of saints. The little Metropole church is very small and is curiously build of fragments from heathen temples.

There were donkey loads of loyliest white grapes, six baskets covered with leaves. Some men wear white kilts and fez hats. Some women have curious jackets and headgear. The people and the west half of the northwest are better looking on the whole than quarter of section twenty-nine, town- the Italians I think. There are more bearded men.
